Over spring and summer the northwestern cities of Idlib and Jisr al-Shughour were taken by an Islamist force spearheaded by al-Qaeda fighters, while, in the east, Palmyra was captured by the Islamic State. In parallel with the Friends of Syria meetings, the most hardline opposition backers were also funding and Syrian Opposition a growing guerrilla movement inside Syria. According to Brennan, Assad had to remain in power for now to allow for a negotiated solution, but that could only happen with sustained military pressure and an opposition amenable to compromise.
